in praise of downtime

Want to raise an emotionally intelligent kid? Try letting your child do her own thing more often. A study at the University of Colorado Boulder found that children who spend more time just playing, as opposed to going to scheduled lessons and practices, exhibited a stronger ability to control their emotions and actions. “Less structure allows kids to make decisions and set goals for themselves,” explains study author Yuko Munakata, Ph.D.