What is Your Major and Why?

By Chelsea Magyar

This semester, the Smithsonian is asking life's big questions. We asked freshman Talia Watrous why she chose to be an English major.

Talia studies English in order to pursue the career of her dreams. "I've always wanted to be an English professor and have my Dead Poets Society moment and stand on the table and tell people to think differently and inspire students, learn from students."

As a student herself, Talia discovered her love of English. "I had an amazing high school English teacher, a couple of them actually. . . they were so full of life and so passionate about talking about big concepts and what it means to be a part of the human condition and what it means to have empathy and be alive, and I think that's why I was inspired by them."

To inspire others as a teacher herself one day, Talia wants to learn more about poetry as a spiritual practice. "Why our brain connects to poems and makes us feel that kind of transcendental feeling that we get. . . teaching a class on that would be the dream."

And though she dreams, Talia wants people to know that English majors are not ditzes. "In a world of science and math, it is really important to remember the power of words and the magic of words."
