

Call for Papers

Human Migration and the Environment

Special Issue of Population and Environment

Deadline: December 11, 2009

Guest Editors:

- ◆ Susana Adamo, CIESIN, Columbia University, USA
 - ◆ Haydea Izazola, Universidad Autónoma Metropolitana–Xochimilco, Mexico
-

For this special issue, we seek a range of papers that examine human migration as related to environmental context. We do so with the aim of enhancing contemporary dialogue regarding the potential migratory impacts of environmental change.

We aim for a collection of research representing both the “push” and the “pull” of environmental factors, as well as other complex dimensions of this association such as related to gender, social inequalities, environmental security, and food security.

More generally, the research should improve broader understanding and theory regarding the association between population and environment. We encourage contributions based on quantitative as well as qualitative data, as well as those that focus on policy dimensions.

Population and Environment publishes research articles (both full-length and research briefs), commentary and reviews related to the reciprocal links between population, natural resources, and the natural environment, with the purpose of deepening scientific and policy dialogue in this often complex area. The coverage is multidisciplinary, spanning a range of social, policy, life, and natural sciences. Work at all scales, local to global, is presented as are both theoretical and empirical contributions.

Submission Deadline: December 11th, 2009. Please submit questions prior to this deadline to Susana Adamo (sadamo@ciesin.columbia.edu) and Haydea Izazola (haydeaizazola@gmail.com). Submitted manuscripts should be formatted in accordance with Population and Environment guidelines available in the journal or at www.springer.com.