

University of Colorado

Boulder • Colorado Springs • Denver

Dec. 5, 2007

Dear CU Alumnus,

The University of Colorado's legal team and insurer have settled the Title IX lawsuit Lisa Simpson brought against the university. The case has been ongoing for six years, often casting a shadow on the great work that happens in our classrooms and research labs and the accomplishments of our alumni. It is time for us to close this chapter in the university's history and focus on what makes the university great.

While the classroom and research work are a constant in the life of the university, in many other ways, we are an entirely different place than we were six years ago. We have new people in 11 of the top 12 leadership positions, including the presidency, two campus chancellors, and the athletic director. We have implemented substantial reforms in the areas of student safety and intercollegiate athletics. Our athletics recruiting program is now one of the strictest among NCAA Division I universities.

In her statement on the settlement, Ms. Simpson commends CU for these efforts and encourages other universities to follow our lead.

Recent district court rulings led to the likelihood that the case would have dragged on for years, at substantial cost. Considerable deliberation went into authorizing the $2.5 million settlement, which our insurer will pay (the settlement with Anne Gilmore is an additional $350,000). No donor money was used in the litigation or settlement. The decision is in the university's best interests. It is time for us to focus on the teaching, research, service and alumni achievements that make the University of Colorado a great institution.

Sincerely,

Hank Brown

President