Conventionally, most people believe that morality can only be based in religious faith—that in a world without God no principles of right and wrong could exist. Related to this, philosophers have long held that no objective, fact-based, rational code of values is possible.

Regarding both points, this talk shows that the exact opposite is true. The purpose of morality is to guide human life on earth—and religion is utterly incapable of it. Flourishing life requires a code of secularism, rationality, egoism and freedom.

Religious faith clashes with every principle of a proper moral code, and, as such, has led, and can only lead to, hell on earth.

This talk is sponsored by the Boulder Objectivist Club.

Funding provided by the UCSU, the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and the Office of the Chancellor.

For more information, contact Jared Seehafer at seehafer@colorado.edu
Conventionally, most people believe that morality can only be based in religious faith—that in a world without God no principles of right and wrong could exist. Related to this, philosophers have long held that no objective, fact-based, rational code of values is possible.

Regarding both points, this talk shows that the exact opposite is true. The purpose of morality is to guide human life on earth—and religion is utterly incapable of it. Flourishing life requires a code of secularism, rationality, egoism and freedom.

Religious faith clashes with every principle of a proper moral code, and, as such, has led, and can only lead to, hell on earth.

This talk is sponsored by the Boulder Objectivist Club.

Funding provided by the UCSU, the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and the Office of the Chancellor.

For more information, contact Jared Seehafer at seehafer@colorado.edu