

TRIBAL COLLEGE STUDENT TRAVEL GRANT

The Culture, Language, and Social Practice student organization (CLASP) at the University of Colorado Boulder is proud to announce a multidisciplinary conference run by graduate students that promotes the broad connections between culture, language, and society grounded in empirical research. The conference is open to all students and faculty interested in and working with sociocultural linguistic traditions including sociolinguistics, linguistic anthropology, literacy, bilingualism, etc. This year we are excited to announce the speakers who will engage us in conversations of indigenous identity, race and marginalization, educational equity, interaction and agency:

Dwanna Robertson

(Race, Ethnicity, and Migration Studies, Colorado College)

Jonathan Rosa

(Graduate School of Education, Stanford University)

Natasha Shrikant

(Department of Communication, University of Colorado Boulder)

Jack Sidnell

(Department of Anthropology, University of Toronto)

Our organization recognizes the value that diverse perspectives can bring to a scholarly endeavor. Year after year we have been proud to present current research and collaborations with indigenous communities, such as Northern Arapaho, Hidatsa, Lakota, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Indigenous Hawaiian, and many others. One substantial way we seek to address diversity in student recruitment at this year's CLASP V conference is to award a $300 travel grant to a student enrolled in a tribal college. The grant will be awarded based on the financial need and academic aspirations. If you are a currently enrolled Tribal College or University student, interested in CLASP agendas, we encourage you to apply for this grant. To apply, submit the following:

- ♦ Your current CV
- ♦ 1-page statement of purpose talking about your reasons in attending the conference and discussing your financial need in travel support
- ♦ Proof of TCU enrollment (e.g., unofficial transcript or a note from Bursar's office)

You can submit your application to clasp.conference@gmail.com by July 31, 2017. In the subject line, please, indicate "TCU student application." We also encourage you to submit an abstract to our conference and present your current or past projects!
